Financial literacy field hearing in Madison draws more than 100 attendees

MADISON – The Financial Literacy and Education Commission hosted a field hearing on improving the financial capabilities in young people on Wednesday, Sept. 25, at the University of Wisconsin. More than 100 people attended.

The Commission shared information about its work with the public and took input on promising practices, critical challenges, and opportunities in promoting the financial capability of children, youth and student populations. The dialogue provided the Commission with insights into the important work occurring in Wisconsin.

Richard Cordray, Director of the federal Consumer Financial Protection Bureau and Vice Chair of the Commission, participated in the hearing. Moderating one of the two panel discussions was David Mancl, Director of the Wisconsin Department of Financial Institutions (DFI) Office of Financial Literacy. In addition, DFI Secretary Peter Bildsten was one of a select group of legislators and financial literacy proponents to participate in a private roundtable meeting with Cordray.

“It was gratifying to have Wisconsin host a field hearing on such an important topic with Richard Cordray and the Commission,” Bildsten said. “We are honored that Director Cordray recognizes the pioneering financial literacy work that is going on in Wisconsin. The dialogue we had will advance the much-needed efforts to elevate the financial capabilities of people of all ages not only in Wisconsin, but in the entire country.”
