Federal commission to host financial literacy field hearing in Madison

MADISON – The Financial Literacy and Education Commission will host a field hearing on improving the financial capabilities in young people on Wednesday, Sept. 25, in Madison. The hearing, which is open to the public, will be held from 8:30 to 11 a.m. at the University of Wisconsin-Madison’s Union South, 1308 W. Dayton St.

The Commission will share information about its work with the public and take public input on promising practices, critical challenges, and opportunities in promoting the financial capability of children, youth and student populations. This dialogue will provide the Commission insights into the important work occurring in Wisconsin and across the country.

Richard Cordray, Director of the federal Consumer Financial Protection Bureau and Vice Chair of the Commission, will participate in the hearing. Moderating one of the two panel discussions will be David Mancl, Director of the Wisconsin Department of Financial Institutions’ Office of Financial Literacy.

The hearing will include a public comments segment during which audience members will be allowed to share their comments on topics related to financial capability issues young people face today. Members of the public will have one minute to share their comments and will need to sign up at the event site to take part in this segment of the hearing.

Space is limited and registration is required. To register, click here.
